Introduction to Commercial Liability Insurance

LEGAL LIABILITY: TORTS, CONTRACTS, AND STATUTES

Every person and all organizations are exposed to liability loss. The possibility of a liability loss is a liability loss exposure. To be able to identify, analyze, and properly handle an organization's liability loss exposures, one must understand the concept of legal liability and the common sources of liability loss exposures.

Anyone who wishes to evaluate an organization’s liability loss exposures must understand the various ways in which the organization may become legally liable. Legal liability imposed by civil law can be based on torts, contracts, or statutes.

A liability insurance policy typically obligates the insurer to defend the insured against allegations that, if true, would be covered under the policy. Therefore, an organization can experience a liability loss even as a result of a suit in which it is not legally held liable. In addition, the policy obligates the insurer to pay damages for which the insured is legally liable. In most liability claims in which the insurer believes that its insured is legally liable, it attempts to settle the claim (by offering to pay a certain amount of damages to the claimant) in order to avoid the additional expense of a court proceeding.

Civil Law and Criminal Law

Legal liability can be imposed by civil law, criminal law, or both. Liability insurance responds to liability imposed by civil law. Insurance for criminal liability is prohibited by law.

In some instances, a single act can constitute both a civil wrong and a crime. For example, if a driver causes the death of a pedestrian, law enforcement authorities may charge the driver with vehicular homicide, a criminal act. The driver may also be subject to a civil action by the estate of the deceased pedestrian for medical bills, funeral expenses, loss of support, and other damages that the law allows. Insurance coverage would not respond to the criminal charges. It could, however, provide payment for the civil claims.

Civil liability can be based on torts, contracts, or statutes. See the exhibit “Bases for Legal Liability.”
Tort
A wrongful act or an omission, other than a crime or a breach of contract, that invades a legally protected right.

Negligence
The failure to exercise the degree of care that a reasonable person in a similar situation would exercise to avoid harming others.

Legal Liability Based on Torts

Torts may be civil wrongs or private wrongs. Most of the claims covered by liability insurance are based on tort law, which protects the rights of individuals. These rights originally included the rights to security of person, property, and reputation. Over the years, legal changes have established other rights of individuals, such as the right to privacy. Where a right exists, others have a corresponding duty to respect it and to refrain from any act or omission that would impair or damage it. Any wrongful invasion of legally protected rights entitles the injured party to bring an action against the wrongdoer for damages.

The numerous types of torts fall into three broad categories:

- Negligence
- Intentional torts
- Strict liability torts

Negligence is based on four elements:

- A duty owed to another person
- A breach of that duty
- A close causal connection between the negligent act (breach of duty) and the resulting harm
- The occurrence of actual loss or damage of a type recognized by law and measurable in monetary terms
For example, a motorist who drives at an unsafe and excessive speed and, as a result, causes an accident that injures another motorist has committed the tort of negligence.

An intentional tort is a tort committed by a person who foresees (or should be able to foresee) that his or her act will harm another person. The act does not necessarily have to be performed with malicious or hostile intent. An example of an intentional tort is libel, the publication of a false statement that damages a person’s reputation.

Strict liability (or absolute liability) is liability that is imposed even though the defendant acted neither negligently nor with intent to cause harm. Common examples of strict liability include liability for abnormally dangerous instrumentalities (such as wild animals), ultrahazardous activities (such as blasting), and dangerously defective products (such as malfunctioning smoke detectors).

Strict liability is also used to describe liability imposed by certain statutes, such as workers compensation laws.

Legal Liability Based on Contracts

In addition to torts, contracts also impose legal liability. If one party fails to honor the promise, the other may go to court to enforce the contract. Liability based on contracts can arise out of either a breach of contract or an agreement one party has made to assume the liability of another party.

Breach of contract is a failure to fulfill one’s contractual promise. A common type of breach of contract involves the promise (called a warranty) made by a seller regarding its product. If the product fails to fulfill its promise, the warranty has been breached, and the buyer can make claim against the seller. The warranty may be either expressly stated or implied by law. For example, the law implies a warranty that every product is fit for the particular purpose for which it is sold. If the product is unfit for its intended purpose and the buyer is injured as a result, the seller may be held legally liable for damages.

Liability for injury or damage resulting from a seller’s breach of warranty is commonly insurable. Other consequences of breach of contract are not insurable. For example, if a builder fails to complete a new store by the promised date, the store owner’s claim for loss of revenue is normally not insurable under the builder’s general liability insurance.

A hold-harmless agreement (or indemnity agreement) typically requires one party to “hold harmless and indemnify” the other party against liability arising from the activity or product that is the subject of the contract.

For example, a building’s lease may obligate the tenant to hold the landlord harmless against any liability claims made by any person injured on the leased premises. The tenant, in this case, is agreeing by contract to pay claims for which the tenant would not otherwise have been legally liable. Construction
